The Renegades
Chapter III: Fort Maine

Their horses snorted, stomping the ground as they stood atop the sloping plains beneath the Weatherpeaks. The sky was black as death, and the wind was cold on their faces. The Knight lowered his visor, and spurred his horse. A mounted griffon flew from his lance tip, as his pendant grappled with the wind.

Ahead of him stood three montruous Giants, lifting great boulders at the warrior. They heaved them, some just grazing the brave man, as he charged on. His lance missed its target, and as he galloped through the titans, a great blow struck him; he jerked forward in his saddle, but refused to fall. Instead he wheeled round, sword in hand, and stabbed a giant thigh; to no avail as they clubbed him again.

Yet he stood, and with a great sweep he cut off a giant knee, sending its owner to the ground.

Now he looked up, and saw the last two, towering above him, great stone clubs raised.

From across the field from where he came, a Haffer watched, uncertain.

"Warren, you brave fool!" he muttered, and then disapeared.

The Knight lept to one side and then rolled, avoiding one blow. But as he jumped forward, he was hit full on by a titanic swing, sending him to the ground; but again, his courage still strong, he rose.

With a quick step to the right, and a mighty jab, he slew another, blood rushing from his groin.

And just as the third was raising his club high above his head to finish the warrior, he cried out in sudden pain, dropping his load; and then he fell, his foot severed. Atop his dying body, Kipox appeared, and planted his little sword 'Longtooth' in the giant's heart.

"They should call me Kipox the Giantslayer!" he shouted.

"More like Footchopper, my friend." answered Sir Warren, lifting himself heavily off the ground.

Together they stared northwest: there stood a vast forest of ancient trees, clinging to the plains and slopes of the Weatherpeak foothills. Towards it they rode; it was not the first time that they had travelled beneath the boughes of the Sinland Forest, and somewhere within they would join their comrades, and ride once again to battle.

In time they came upon Fort Maine in the hills. There stood Sir Aquilius whose name was legend, Sir Warren the Brave, the crafty Willian whom many feared, Kipox whose height did not match his success, Ravenoke the Druid, Lance the Archer from Dalmatia, and Og the Snagahai.

"I came here, long ago, and found a peaceful town that gave me shelter. Now I see only the scum who slew those people and sacked their town. I say we kill them all." spoke Sir Warren, coldly.

"So, how do we do it? We could try to sneak over the wall, or maybe cause a diversion..." wondered Kipox.

"Sneaking is the game of cowards! I say we take them!" shouted Aquilius, as he spurred his great stallion onward.

They arrived at the gates, and it was Aquilius who answered the challenge:

"Let us through or die stopping us!"

And with that he tossed up a magical rope, and climbed to a high window upon the tower wall. With sword drawn, he killed the guard behind it, and crumpled the bars as he lept in. The others followed, with the two cavaliers holding off the hobgoblins as they did.

From gate to gate there were screams and fire. The Renegades left no one to tell the tale. The fort threw everything they had against them, but their worst would only slow the adventurer's pace.

In an hour they took the castle, and then rested before they attacked the deeps below.

The story was differant there, as the mighty warriors wandered about a great labrynthe of tunnels. But in the end, they slew the evil enchantress who ruled the lot, and freed the wretched slaves held captive.

In honor of his courage and loyalty to the party, the others gave the fort to Sir Warren of Gorgmir, who then promised to there build a great castle of goodness and hope in these times of darkness.

Thus the Renegades stood about the ruins of the old courtyard as a fire blazed before them, laughing merrily beneath the stars...

Chapter II: Shem's Lair

*T*he streets were packed on market day in Lark-Han, as merchants, farmers and tradesmen from afar came to exchange wares in the colorful avenues of this important city. Among the crowds a band of adventurers roamed, straying through the shops and past the stands about them. At their head strode a mighty warrior with a great beard and a stern gaze. He stood tall, dominating most who were near. He turned, while holding a garment from a stand, towards a beautiful Elven lady, of amber hair and charming smile. He spoke: "Ah, Dremia, 'tis too bad our friend Woodstock had to leave, even though he did always land us in trouble."

"Yes, he was with the Sons when I first met you all, near Darkon Andar, my home." she replied.

"I remember the time when his brother Garfag fell to his death in Seaton. Ha! Those were the days! And Ronin who got thrown in irons! I still can't believe Elric rescued him."

"You speak of the Old Continent, my young friend Boromir, long ere I met you. But I have heard tales, and once in awhile I hear some of you talk of the old days, of Saltmarsh and Hyrkanians." she answered.

"Enough! Let us talk of the futur," said the strong man as he threw some shillings to the vender and took the cloak. "let's talk about Shem! Who is coming of the mighty Sons of Fantasy? Or have we all lost our nerve and cower at the mention of a mere dragon?"

"Perhaps a mere dragon for you, Boromir son of Denethor, but a great beast of fell power to us!" muttered the valiant Warren from behind, as they all strolled past the old docks.

"It will be but the three of us and Willian of the group, and two others who wish to prove themselves." spoke the fair maiden.

"Yeah? And who, other than that pompous menstral who claims to be a mage?" asked Warren, chomping on a stick of meat.

As he finished this, a chill wind rushed by, and the party turned up their collars, looking doubtfully at the sky.

"A ranger named Joby. I think he's just a Runner." spoke the crafty Elf Willian, who had just run up towards them. He was short, with sharp features and piercing green eyes. "I've come to tell you all that the Seabreeze sets sail in two days. Aquilius says he'll meet us in Akania, wherever that is.

The winds rose, and the party hurried towards the Salamander Inn through the bustling streets.

But then two quick snaps were heard, and Boromir was struck from behind by two bolts. He turned, rage in his eyes; luckily the points had barely pierced his armor: Down the road stood two assassins. The Sons of Fantasy charged. One of the two killers broke away and ran into a close building, while th'other stood, sword drawn. Willian, quick on his feet, dashed after the one, whilst Boromir drew his longsword and faced his would-be slayer.

With two blows the assassin's body slumped to the ground, his face a ruin. From the roadside emerged Willian, cleaning his sword. Boromir nodded at him, and smiled.

It was later found that the two men were bounty hunters after one of the many rewards on Boromir's head.

The day came for the party to debark. As the Sun rose in the east, the doors of the Salamander opened onto three inches of fresh snow and a chill wind.

"Onward! To the docks!" ordered Boromir, cheerily marching across the empty sqaure, his feet stomping on the virgin snow.

Thus on Autumn 91st of the year 3110 Numedian, the Sons of Fantasy set sail under an overcast sky and the eyes of God. For two days they travelled, with a bracing wind and high seas.

During the voyage, it is said that the ranger Joby lost all control and wound up pawing at some of the attractive women crew-member's legs. But as they say, this is but 'news from Bree'.

On the third day of Winter, the ship docked at the port of Zolna, capital and largest city of North Akania. Here, further east, it had not yet snowed, though clouds gathered high above.

"Here we are, friends. It's good to set foot on solid ground again." spoke Boromir.

"Sure, but I'd rather be anywhere but here! Look at all these niggers, damn it!" spat Willian. "I've never seen so much gator-bait walking around before."

"Be quiet, Willian." answered Dremia.

"Perhaps I should compose a song to commemorate the dawning of a new adventure!" wondered the minstrel.

"Last time you tried to sing we almost threw you overboard, so hold your tongue!" replied Warren.

Days passed, and the party joined a caravan heading towards distant lands (Dalmatia) by way of Shem's lair. The ride was smoothe, as the party rode atop the heavy carts, clad in warm furs as the weather grew cold. The raucous noise of an ill-tuned lyre and a hoarse voice rang out continuously throughout the journey as the adventurer's minstrel sang.

And then on the third day a heavy snow began to fall. Before long the caravan halted; it snowed steadily as the winds rose to roaring speeds.

"It hasn't snowed this hard for many years! It's an omen, i'm sure." whispered Mike, a Haffer who was riding in the same cart. "The good thing is that now the dragon can't see us. We're now below the very mountain where it lives."

"We are? Good! Ready your weapons, adventurers, the game is afoot!" shouted the brave Boromir with a smile of glee on his face. But as he finished, drums rolled in the distance. One, two. One, two. One, two. One, two.

Shem - ba. Shem - ba. Shem - ba. Shem - bababa. Shem - ba.

"What the hell is that?" shouted Warren, drawing his sword.

"Oh, just the Shemba cult. There are only a few thousand of them." answered Mike.

"Only te...Listen guys, lets go get that dragon. I'd rather be roasted then eaten alive by savages!"

"The cult worships the dragon, you twit. If you kill it, then there won't be any savages." shouted the Haffer.

"Who are you calling a twit, you runt?"

"Oh, shut up and let's kill that blasted dragon." mumbled Boromir.

They climbed the hill, until high atop, they found a blackened cave entrance: The door to Shem's lair.

Down the throat of the crevass they charged, Willian showing admirable bravery and a knack for self-abuse. Despite many traps, sorcery and winding passages, the troup found themselves standing before the doors of the beast's den. The cieling was covered in thick, dark smoke that issued from the room beyond.

To everyone's surprise, the doors smashed open! A gust of fire and a flash of light turned the Haffer and Minstrel to molten flesh! The worm was about.

In a sudden burst of courage, the rogue Willian led his comrades in a valiant charge: A blast of red death was enough to fell Joby, leaving the death toll at three.

An emmense mass of flesh lay propped upon a pile of glittering gold. It looked down and stared in awe: Never before had anyone dared face him on his own terms. Fear now crept into the very heart of the monster.

Flames erupted, swords swung and arrows flew. Claws gripped upon flesh and forced the brave crew to retreat.

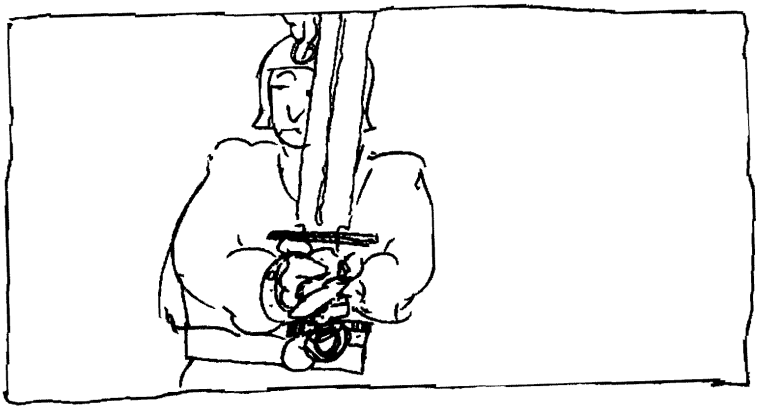

Outside the great doors, where their comrades lay dead, the Sons of Fantasy lay wait, panting, weapons poised, battle rage and bloodthirst rampant.

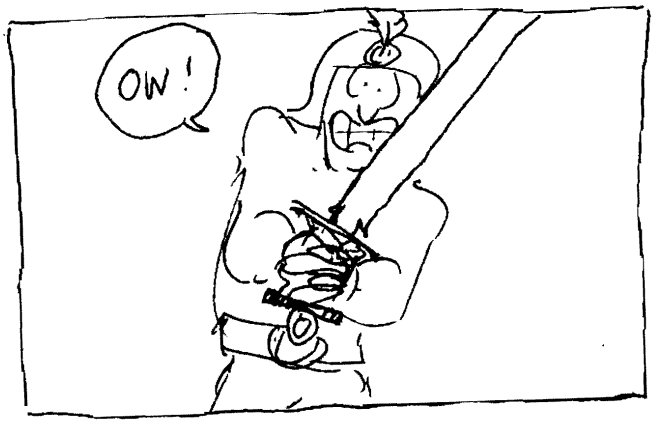

Shem charged forth and struck out! But 'twas in vain as he found his heart transfixed by the cold steel of his victors. He fell to the earthen ground, his reign of terror forever ended.

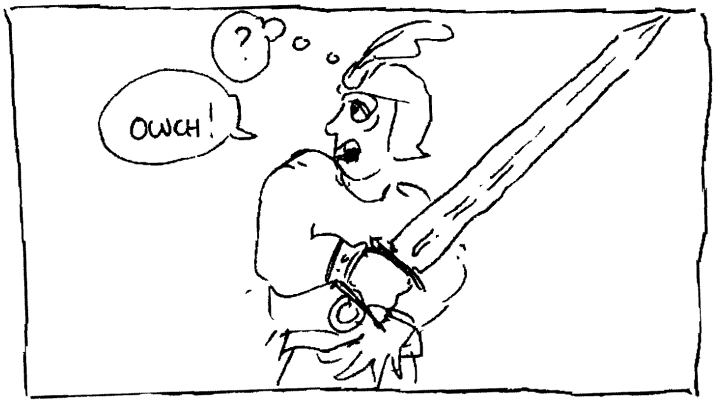

"A battle well fought," muttered Boromir, one blood-covered boot atop the dragon's head.

ORTANT*IMPORTANT*IMPORTANT*IMPORTANT*IMPORTANT*IMPORTANT*IMPORTANT*IMP

To all of you (and I know that means ALL of you) who want to contribute to the all-mighty, ever-reveared, always-loved and never-wrong Adventure Log Magazine, here's how to do it:

Sujested Material: Stories, Cartoons, Drawings, Advice, Personal Messages and so on. If you have any rules you'd like to suggest, please talk to me first.

Second and final stage: Hand it in to me no later than the Wednesday before we play. Or the Wednesday before we play, you will always find me at Eddie's after school.

Well, to sum up, I'd like to thank those of you who have contributed to the Log: Nic for his great drawings throughout the ol' Log (including the cover, 3 times) and great cartoons. The Herbsman for his Scriptures, Todd for his cartoons and art, Ben (even though he's not here) for his work on the old Campaign Info page that faded away and suggesting articles such as the 'New Ranger'(#1), and John for his ideas on the Star Frontiers and new weapon rules that used to appear from time to time. So, now to present this issues Rat Award: this time it goes to Nic.
